Michelle Obama confronts protester, threatens to leave fundraiser

First Lady Michelle Obama experienced a rare face-to-face encounter with a protester late Tuesday - approaching the activist and threatening to leave a fundraiser if the person did not stop interrupting her speech.

Obama was addressing a Democratic Party fundraiser in a private Kalorama home in Northwest Washington when Ellen Sturtz, 56, a lesbian activist interrupted her remarks to demand that President Obama sign an anti-discrimination executive order.

Mrs. Obama showed her displeasure - pausing to confront Sturtz eye to eye, according to witnesses.

"One of the things that I don't do well is this," she said to applause from most of the guests, according to a White House transcript. "Do you understand?"

A pool report from a reporter in the room said Mrs. Obama "left the lectern and moved over to the protester." The pool report quoted Mrs. Obama as saying: "Listen to me or you can take the mic, but I'm leaving. You all decide. You have one choice."

The audience responded by asking Obama to remain, according to the pool report, which quoted a woman nearby telling Sturtz, "You need to go."

Sturtz was escorted out of the room. She said in an interview later she was stunned by Mrs. Obama's response.

"She came right down in my face," Sturtz said. "I was taken aback."

Sturtz said she paid $500 to attend the fundraiser, part of a protest cooked up by the gay rights group GetEqual, which gained notice in Obama's first term for hectoring him during speeches and demanding more action on lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender issues.

The proposed executive order that prompted Sturtz's outburst would prohibit federal contractors from discriminating on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity.

LGBT activists, many of whom hailed Obama for his vocal support for same-sex marriage rights in the months leading up to his reelection in 2012, have been increasingly dismayed that the White House has not yet acted on the proposed order.
